These guidelines are intended to provide a general overview of the procedures for analyzing footwear impressions. They are not intended to be a substitute for the specific procedures and standards of the relevant forensic laboratory.

1.1.1. The first step in the analysis of a footwear impression is to determine the type of shoe that made the impression. This is done by comparing the impression to a known shoe or a list of known shoes. The next step is to determine the size of the shoe. This is done by measuring the length and width of the impression.

1.1.2. The next step is to determine the direction of travel. This is done by looking at the angle of the impression. The final step is to determine the brand of the shoe. This is done by looking at the tread pattern and other distinctive features.

1.1.3. The final step is to determine the age of the shoe. This is done by looking at the wear and tear on the sole and the tread pattern.

1.1.4. The final step is to determine the location of the shoe. This is done by looking at the surrounding area and any other evidence.

1.1.5. The final step is to determine the type of surface the shoe was on. This is done by looking at the texture and color of the impression.

1.1.6. The final step is to determine the type of terrain the shoe was on. This is done by looking at the shape and size of the impression.

1.1.7. The final step is to determine the type of weather the shoe was on. This is done by looking at the moisture and temperature of the impression.
