In addition, T cells can produce antibodies that help other components of the immune system to kill cancer cells and pathogens. Other activated T cells release cytokines that stimulate the immune system. Additionally, these processes, called the immune response, produce other cells called lymphocytes and other cell components, such as antibodies, cells that kill specific cells, activation of complement, phagocytosis and endocytosis.

Below are the answers to the questions of this diagram that have been indicated by a question. You can use these answers to check your own responses. Note that with each question, there are two different answers. The first answer is the correct one, the second one is the wrong one. The wrong answers are given to test your understanding of the concepts.
