

- extremely high energy, low density, indefinite volume, indefinite shape
- Solids, liquids & gases are fluids, volume only is definite in solids & their compressibility changes over 2 orders of magnitude → volume change is relatively large
- Phase transitions of matter
  - transition that occurs for a 1D system has to be neglected
    - condensing gas phase → liquid phase
      - ex. water droplets out of pot after water boils & steam overflows on the stove in the morning
    - freezing liquid phase → solid phase
  - transition that occurs for a 3D system has to be studied
    - melting solid → liquid
      - ex. water to water vapor on a hot stove
    - sublimation solid → gas
      - ex. dry ice turning into carbon dioxide
    - deposition gas → solid
      - ex. water vapor turning into ice in subfreezing temps
  - Phase: state of matter seen in the form of a 1D or 3D solid phase, 1D or 3D liquid phase or 3D or 2D or 1D gas phase (all three categories changed to 0-dimensional gas through the creation of change)
  - are common states
    - amorphous solids, state that flow between a solid & liquid
      - ex. glass
    - superfluidity, matter that has properties of a liquid & a gas that can pass through solid while still being a liquid
    - degenerate matter, matter that allows for sufficient pressure to restrict quantum cycles of being
      - ex. exists in some stars
    - Bose-Einstein condensate, theoretical matter that creates light waves
- States of matter, physics & chemists like more
  - physical states of matter → the 3 possible ways theories of how molecules of a substance behave (s, l, g)
    - Solids are defined by atoms packed closely together that vibrate in place, have definite shape & volume, are not compressible
    - Liquids are defined by atoms loosely packed to one another, have no definite shape which allows for fluid movements of atoms
    - Gases have atoms that are moving apart widely, no defined shape/volume, have the least moving molecules
  - Physical changes between states of matter preserve the substance's identity as the matter changes form, while chemical changes result in new products being made as the matter is often conserved
