Haplotype effects are also observed in heterozygous genotypes, although heterozygous comparisons are complicated by penetrance, incomplete penetrance, and varying base levels for most of these features. The haplotypes with the lowest penetrance values, such as those showing null expressivity in the heterozygous state, are also the ones with the lowest values in the homozygous state. This pattern suggests a relationship between penetrance and expressivity in the heterozygous state. This pattern is also observed in other categories of variants, such as those showing dominant expressivity in the heterozygous state. These results suggest that penetrance and expressivity are related in the heterozygous state. This pattern is also observed in other categories of variants, such as those showing dominant expressivity in the heterozygous state.
