and the liver are the two organs containing most of the body's iron. In the liver, iron is stored in ferritin, which is a protein that binds to iron. The liver also contains a protein called transferrin, which carries iron to other parts of the body. When the body needs iron, it releases it from ferritin and transferrin. The iron is then used to make hemoglobin, which carries oxygen to the body's cells. The liver also contains a protein called ceruloplasmin, which binds to iron and helps to protect the body from iron overload.

Consequently, studies involving children and adolescents are of great interest. Previous studies have shown that adolescent boys with autism spectrum disorder (ASD) have more difficulties with social communication and social interaction than boys with other developmental disorders (e.g., attention deficit hyperactivity disorder, non-specific developmental delay). Boys with ASD also have more difficulties with social communication and social interaction than boys with other developmental disorders (e.g., attention deficit hyperactivity disorder, non-specific developmental delay).

and a more detailed description of the data is given in the following section. The data are used to estimate the effect of the different variables on the probability of being a victim of a violent crime.
