The Count's Millions Émile Gaboriau, 2015-10-23

It was a Thursday evening, the fifteenth of October, and although only half past six o'clock it had been dark for some time already. The weather was cold and the sky was as black as ink while the wind blew tempestuously and the rain fell in torrents. The servants at the Hotel de Chalusse, one of the most magnificent mansions in the Rue de Courcelles in Paris, were assembled in the porter's lodge, a little building comprising a couple of rooms standing on the right-hand side of the great gateway. Here, as in all large mansions, the concierge or porter, M. Bourigeau, was a person of immense importance, always able and disposed to make any one who was inclined to doubt his authority feel it in cruel fashion. As could be easily seen, he held all the other servants in his power. He could let them absent themselves without leave if he chose, and conceal all returns late at night after the closing of public balls and wine shops. Thus it is needless to say that M. Bourigeau and his wife were treated by their fellow servants with the most servile adulation. The owner of the house was not at home that evening, so that M Casimir the count s head valet was serving coffee for the benefit of all the retainers And while the company sipped the fragrant beverage which had been generously tinctured with cognac provided by the
