
Students in the 19th-century history classes are not only studying "great" individuals in politics, but also studying their "failing problems" and the problems described in scientific literature and suggesting solutions to these problems. They studied Europe as a whole as a political system, as well as the states and their systems through political science, geography and international law. These systems are different from today's political science, the military, history and politics, and the legal system, making a different history process. However, when we look at the impact of the system.
