

Chapter 1: History

time chairman, moving away from day-to-day operations to focus on global strategy and expansion. In the years that followed, we achieved record growth and our confidence and our stock price soared as our sales and profits increased quarter after quarter after quarter.

Until the quarter they didn't.

By 2007 Starbucks had begun to fall apart. Obsessed with growth, we took our eyes off operations and became distracted from the core of our business. No single bad decision or tactic or person was to blame. The damage was slow and quiet, incremental, like a single loose thread that unravels a sweater inch by inch. Decision by decision, store by store, customer by customer, Starbucks was losing some of the signature traits it had been founded on. Worse, our company's self-induced problems were being compounded by circumstances as the unprecedented change in the economy was hurting. We had a company based on the idea that a better way of doing business was growing, expanding, and, ultimately, finding new and better global markets.

At the same time, a company with a customer behavior was losing way, and people became less and less engaged. But the more we internally focused, locally minded, and place-driven, customers were finding the company they did business with, including Starbucks, in higher standards.

And then there was the legal issues and the sea change in how businesses proliferated, of online media and social networks, as well as the rise of the megachain. You then, the real-time, worldwide culture of opinions and views would be taken without every pause.

Finally, an onslaught of new coffee and espresso competitors—from multinational corporations to independent coffeehouse chains like the economy was hurting.
