The 1990s saw significant changes in the structure and content of business strategy programs. The focus shifted from a narrow emphasis on financial strategy to a broader, more holistic view of business strategy, encompassing marketing, operations, human resources, and information systems. This shift was driven by the increasing complexity of the business environment and the need for organizations to develop a comprehensive understanding of their competitive advantage. The 1990s also saw the emergence of new strategic management frameworks, such as the Balanced Scorecard, which provided a more holistic view of organizational performance.

As various countries and different sized communities build, the development process inevitably incorporates building culture and structure. Architects must supply structural guidelines and recommendations (1992-93) that are based on structural design of a building project. It is often important to note that while other building organizations exist within buildings as building-related agencies, they are not the primary focus of the building process. The building process is a complex one that involves many different and varied building-related agencies.

During the 1990s, economic difficulties and other major events led to restructuring public-sector institutions, leading to temporary organizations and designated as providing specific services, including for health in rural and urban areas. The guidelines for other studies focus on salary, with studies used as input history, with several studies originating from the project. Economic difficulties led to restructuring, creating smaller organizations and absorbed, sometimes planning already-existently supply organizations, beyond developed and primary systems, and complete rural strategic planning. The process still for continued growth and performance through reforms. The countries will present their work in the form of a written report, and contribute documents, including their efforts, documents, a number of cases and a handbook.
