

Chapter Two:

Cost Term, Concept and Classification

2.1 Cost concepts and cost related Terminologies

Definition of cost

Many accounting reports contain several cost terminologies. A good understanding of the different cost terminology is essential at least for the following two reasons.

- ✓ It enables accounting information users to best the information provided.
- ✓ Use of common terminologies avoids confusion and misunderstanding among the users.

The traditional uses of accounting systems include the following.

- a) Measuring performance
- b) Justifying investment
- c) Product Pricing
- d) Valuing inventories

Accountants define cost as a resource sacrificed or forgone to achieve a specific objective. A cost (such as direct materials or advertising) is usually measured as the monetary amount that must be paid to acquire goods or services. An actual cost is the cost incurred (a historical or past cost), as distinguished from a budgeted cost, which is a predicted or forecasted cost (a future cost). In the above definition, there are two important ideas included:

1. Cost measures the use of resources in terms of monetary units. This implies that cost is quantitative information; cost tries to measure the use of labor hours, materials, machine hours and other inputs in terms of monetary units. The monetary unit refers to the currency of the country such as, Birr in Ethiopia, Nira in Nigeria, Nakifa in Eritrea, etc.
2. The second idea is that cost measurement is related to a particular purpose or activity. This purpose is referred to as a cost object. Cost object is defined as anything in which a separate measurement of costs is desired. To quite their decisions, managers want to know how much a particular thing (such as a product, service, machine, or process) costs, we call this thing cost object. This idea makes the definition of cost meaningful. For instance, if one says to you that the cost is Br 10,000, do you understand what he/she means? Surely you will ask a cost of what? Therefore, Birr 10,000 is not a cost data because it is not related to a particular cost object. If it is said that the cost of office furniture is Br 10,000, this will be meaningful. The term cost object may refer a narrow level of activity or broad level of activity. For example, the cost object can be the organization as a whole or it may refer to a particular product produced during a specific period of time. The following table illustrates some possible cost object.

| Cost Object | Illustrations                                                                              |
|-------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Product     | Arm chair for use in office                                                                |
| Project     | Research and Development project to test the validity and marketability of a specific item |
| Service     | Telephone line installed to provide to telephone service to the public                     |
| Department  | Cost of running Department of Accounting in Hawassa University                             |
| Activity    | Frequency of movement of raw material from the store to the production place               |
| Customer    | Import and wholesale Company which purchase in large quantities                            |
