Tiernan,2017-10-11 Excerpt from Conflict of Laws There are three general systems of legal instruction in use in American Law Schools the lecture the case and the text method Regardless of the relative superiority of one to the others the author is convinced after seven years teaching experience that no one of these methods alone is adequate to sound thorough instruction in the law In his presentation of this difficult subject in the class room he has produced satisfactory results only by a combination of text cases and lecture in proper proportion The value of a text in stating the principles of the law in brief form can not be denied The necessity of reading leading decisions that support and apply those principles is indisputable And finally there is the general discussion in class the Instructor When necessary expounding the subject imparting the benefits of his knowledge and experience and observation thereby arousing and sustaining interest in the work these are the things that elevate instruction from the mechanical to the intellectual In presenting this text therefore the author makes no defense He has embodied the fundamentals of the subject in the text in simple form He has scrupulously selected the leading decisions and included them in the notes Where they are identified by large conspicuous citation Finally instead of merely stating the law he has by clear simple language explained it so as to reproduce as far as possible the full value of the class instruction It is this very feature it is believed that will commend it for Law School purposes to Instructor and class alike
