However, we hypothesize that the 100% or greater increased water storage used to reduce forest evapotranspiration should result in increased water availability to the water table, especially where there has been a long history of low rainfall and/or high evapotranspiration. Some additional evidence supporting this hypothesis is provided by the relationship between water storage and the number of species per 100 ha. The data in Table 10 suggest that water storage is positively correlated with species richness, and therefore, water availability per hectare. This is consistent with the literature on the relationship between water availability and species richness.
