Evaluations of fragrances: Linalool, Phenylpropanol, Benzylaldehyde and Linalyl acetate

Introduction

Abstract

Individuals with olfactory dysfunction, i.e. ability to smell fragrances that are congenital or from aging, have been reported to be diagnosed with a number of non-olfactory conditions including depression, hypertension and heart disease. This work is the first to evaluate the olfactory properties of linalool, phenylpropanol, benzylaldehyde and linalyl acetate.

Our findings demonstrate that these four compounds can be used to predict the presence of olfactory problems in young adults and boys children. Phenylpropanol and linalool were chosen for the validation of our commercialized olfactory test because they are the most potent olfactory compounds in our fragrance library. These two fragrance compounds are relatively cheap. Phenylpropanol is a key fragrance in the perfume industry. Phenylpropanol is a fragrance that is a key fragrance in the perfume industry. Phenylpropanol is a fragrance that is a key fragrance in the perfume industry. Phenylpropanol is a fragrance that is a key fragrance in the perfume industry.

Results

Our four fragrance compounds could predict olfactory problems, even the congenital ones, in children and young adults. Results show that fragrance is a good way to predict olfactory problems.

Conclusion

1. Measure 10 µl of the fragrance solution (linalool, phenylpropanol, benzylaldehyde and linalyl acetate) in the test tube and a blank solution. The test solution and blank are placed side-by-side. Let one drop fall on each. These four substances are fragrances to test for olfactory problems.
2. Add 10 drops of the fragrance solution to the test tube or 10 µl of fragrance to the blank solution from the blank solution.

If you add 10 µl of the test solution to the test tube and you add 10 µl of the blank solution to the blank solution, then the test tube will be clear and the blank solution will be cloudy.
