These Polydimethylsiloxane (PDMS)-based membranes (PDMS) are specifically designed to be permeable to gases, allowing oxygen and carbon dioxide to pass through, while blocking water and electrolytes. This property is crucial for the operation of the fuel cell, as it ensures that the reactants (hydrogen and oxygen) can reach the catalyst layers, while the products (water and carbon dioxide) are removed. The PDMS membrane also acts as a separator, preventing the mixing of the hydrogen and oxygen gases, which could lead to a safety hazard. The PDMS membrane is typically 10-20 micrometers thick, which is thin enough to allow for efficient gas transport, but thick enough to provide mechanical strength and prevent leakage. The PDMS membrane is also chemically stable, which allows it to be used in a wide range of environments, including those with high temperatures and pressures. The PDMS membrane is a key component of the fuel cell, and its performance is critical to the overall efficiency and durability of the device.
