FLYING PRESS COPYRIGHT DRAWING

prototype programme was announced in October with the Canadian Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, DHC and United Aircraft of Canada during the development costs. The first of two prototypes will fly in the second half of 1974 with full cost contribution in 1975.

Among the factors leading to a decision in favour of the DHC-7 at this time are the general opening to airline business and a consequent hardening of the market for new types; the growing importance of QJOL-type aircraft in future airline planning; the ending, in September, of an eight-month strike of production workers at de Havilland's Downsview factory, near Toronto; and the agreement between de Havilland and The Boeing Company for joint marketing of the aircraft. Boeing interest in the DHC-7 dates from August 1973, when a technical evaluation was undertaken, lasting four months and covering the production plans, marketing and pricing concepts. Subsequently the two companies concluded a new agreement providing for Boeing to continue to participate in marketing of the DHC-7, and to help conclude the market decisions made in which de Havilland had been working since 1967. There is no Boeing engineering input in the design of the DHC-7 although the two companies have collaborated closely on the design of aircraft using the supersonic wing.

DHC-7 in detail

Since 1967, the overall configuration of the DHC-7 has remained substantially unchanged, although weights have increased further to the values shown on page 78, and there have been some small changes in dimensions as detail design proceeded. As the illustrations accompanying this account show, the DHC-7 is a single-engine high wing aircraft, the only unconventional feature of which is the T-tail, an arrangement more usually found on modern turboprop types than on a propeller-driven aircraft but a continuation of de Havilland's design style introduced on the Buffalo. Structural design is based on the objective of a crack-free service life of at least 40,000 flight hours, to be achieved by using low stress levels, fatigue-resistant materials in critical areas of the fuselage skin and bonded

Lighter structure of the wing than is shown in this diagram, which illustrates the use of some parts for the internal engine and fuselage parts to allow the flap doors to their landing position.
