

OPERATION

DECOMPRESSION RESULTS. When the diver enters the decompression mode, the computer will display the surface to be no longer permissible. The diver is required to remain at the indicated "waiting" or off-gas depth. This is done during a decompression (DECO) stop for a series of 10000 steps depending upon the amount of nitrogen absorption in the body.

As the no-decompression time approaches the end of the dive, a warning begins flashing when less than 2 minutes remain (Fig. 14). If the no-decompression warning flashes, and you remain at depth, the computer will switch into the decompression mode, and a decompression profile will be calculated.

The Great Pit One Computer provides you with the depth at which to stop, the amount of time to stop, and total ascent time to reach the surface. Total ascent time represents time to the surface at the prescribed rate of ascent plus the time spent at all DECO stops. As the decompression stop continues, the total ascent time will increase with nitrogen absorption (saturation). The total ascent time is represented by the flashing time bar (Fig. 15). The bar will continue to grow with increasing saturation.

As with no-decompression calculations, decompression calculations are updated every second. Multiple DECO stops may be required for dives with increased saturation.

Fig. 13. The "GLIMP" alarm will appear, on the right side, if the ascent rate is exceeded. This display shows a fast ascent was made when an time reached "0".

Fig. 14. The decompression depth shows 1 minute of no-decompression time remaining. NOTE: The time bar has disappeared, and the decompression warning is flashing. If an ascent is not made in one minute, the Great Pit One will enter the decompression mode.

Fig. 15. This is an example of a decompression stop. The bottom time is 10 minutes, a constant depth of 100 feet, and a decompression stop is required at 10 feet for 2 minutes. The total ascent time including decompression is a minute. NOTE: The time bar is flashing, indicating decompression is required. The flashing bar will continue to grow if an ascent is not made.
