

Historical Aspects

It is the author's belief that the most effective way to develop a truly informed approach to the many facets of the environment will be to develop major and minor research activities designed to examine the following: (a) the environmental consequences of world population growth, (b) the environmental consequences of world economic growth, (c) the environmental consequences of world energy consumption, (d) the environmental consequences of world food consumption, (e) the environmental consequences of world industrialization, and (f) the environmental consequences of world urbanization. These environmental topics are closely interconnected and interdependent. The author believes that a comprehensive approach to these environmental topics will be the most effective way to contribute to the development of a truly informed environmental policy.
