

Chapter 20: Assessing Internal-User Risks (Pages 10,000–10,200)

Internal-User Classification

Internal users have authority questions. Because these questions sound like authority questions, don't let them get away. Make sure your classification approach allows authority questions.

Classification

- Superuser (also known as root or administrator) has authority to do almost anything.

These questions represent superusers because they are able to do almost anything. Under normal circumstances, root is not used. Normal users will have authority to do almost anything, so they are not superusers. Superusers are typically those who are part of the root group. Normal users have authority to do almost anything because they have authority to do almost anything and others (e.g., users) don't have authority to do almost anything. Normal users are not superusers because they have authority to do almost anything and others (e.g., users) don't have authority to do almost anything.

Normal users

- Normal users (also known as regular users) have authority to do almost nothing.
- Normal users don't have authority to do almost anything.
- Normal users don't have authority to do almost anything.
- Normal users don't have authority to do almost anything.

If they want to do almost anything, they are doing almost nothing. Normal users have authority to do almost nothing. Normal users don't have authority to do almost nothing.

Classification of users (also known as authority classification)

- Superuser (also known as root or administrator) has authority to do almost anything.
- Normal users don't have authority to do almost anything.

If the users are going to do almost nothing, then they must have authority to do almost nothing.

Classification of users (also known as authority classification)

- Superuser (also known as root or administrator) has authority to do almost anything.

Because the users are doing almost nothing, they must have authority to do almost nothing.

- Normal users (also known as regular users) have authority to do almost nothing.
