

II. Responses to New Faculty Questions

Below are responses of the authors to common questions from new faculty members. The following questions are often asked by new faculty members upon arrival at a new institution.

A. Departmental Issues

How often will faculty members be evaluated and promoted, when does tenure and how long does tenure usually take to be granted?

Faculty members should expect to be evaluated annually. Evaluation results determine promotion to senior or associate ranks.

Associate faculty have teaching, research, publication, and service responsibilities.

Associate faculty expect tenure to be granted after 5 years.

Assistant faculty expect tenure to be granted after 7 years.

Assistant faculty may be granted tenure after 5 years.

B. Responses to New Faculty Questions

How often will faculty members be evaluated and promoted, when does tenure and how long does tenure usually take to be granted?

Explaining the evaluation process may be more difficult than explaining tenure because the evaluation process does not necessarily occur within the tenure evaluation process.

The evaluation process is a simple 3-year process that uses a form of peer review to evaluate the teaching, research, publication, and service responsibilities.

Some faculty members may choose the evaluation process of tenure evaluation while others do not.

Faculty may be asked to do this, and only they can submit forms.

Some faculty members may choose the evaluation process of tenure evaluation.

Explaining the evaluation process may be more difficult than explaining tenure.
