

1. Production Process Characterization

Theoretical developments have found ways to plan and conduct a Production Process Characterization study (PPC) in an increasingly systematic way. This will lead to a more consistent approach to planning and conducting studies in design or manufacturing research and to greater consistency in the way that data are collected, as well as to a more consistent interpretation of the data and to a more consistent way of reporting the results. The use of a systematic approach to the design and analysis of studies will lead to a more consistent interpretation of the data and to a more consistent way of reporting the results.
