Kevin Coughlin, NCEP Vice President for Education

to 2006. This trend could hurt the economy if it continues since hunters spend nearly $2.9 billion on trips, equipment, licenses, and other items to support their hunting activities in 2006. Likewise, the number of anglers is decreasing. From 1996 to 2006, the number of anglers 16 years old and above decreased 15%. Fishing in the Great Lakes dropped 50% in the same time period. In Alaska, one of the most popular states for hunting and fishing, recreational fishing decreased by 20% and recreational hunting decreased by 24%. Nationally, fishing-related spending decreased by 19% in the last 10 years. One positive trend is that wildlife-watching has increased 17%. Wildlife-watching Americans spent $45 billion in 2005 on their activities.<sup>16</sup>

In addition to dwindling sales of hunting and fishing goods and services, state hunting and fishing license sales have plummeted. Many states rely on millions of dollars from license fees to protect threatened animal populations and control other menacing populations like deer. If the sales continue to decline, state resource agencies will be hit hard and may be unable to keep up many important conservation activities.<sup>17</sup>

Visits to our national parks have decreased 23% over the last 15 years, and park-associated recreation businesses are at risk for revenue losses, too.<sup>18</sup> In 2004, recreation workers held about 350,000 jobs. According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, about 35% of year-round recreation workers are employed by local governments, mostly in park and recreation departments.<sup>19</sup> A continued nature deficit would result in even more local recreation budget cutbacks, thereby perpetuating nature deficit by reducing the already limited number of local green areas for children to experience.

Loss of Potential Conservation Savings

According to calculations by the National Environmental Education Foundation, improved environmental knowledge could result in $70-billion in savings to the national economy from energy conservation and environmentally friendly behaviors. Without effective environmental education for tomorrow's leaders, and without children who want to connect to the natural world, however, the nation could lose out on this considerable annual savings.<sup>20</sup>

The Future of American Conservation

Exploring the Great Outdoors Is a Special American Cultural Value

In a recent national survey, 92% of Americans responded that they "love to be outdoors," and 91% believed that today's children are not spending enough time outside.<sup>21</sup> Exploring the outdoors is part of the American experience. From the railroad forests to the Gulf Stream waters, Americans connect to the diverse landscapes of our country. If we lose this nature-child connection, we will lose a special part of our national culture and identity.

Instilling a Living-Trees Environmental Ethic in Our Youth

Direct childhood experience in nature before age 11 promotes a long-term connection to nature.<sup>22</sup> Studies of British environmental education, a comparison of interventions with American and Norwegian environmental activities, and comprehensive analysis of EE. Suburban environmental professionals demonstrate that childhood contact with nature is essential to shaping a lasting environmental ethic, and an interest in environmental professions.<sup>23</sup> Organizations like the Scouts, environmental education programs, and Outward Bound-type programs during the teen years also serve as formative experiences in creating a sustained ethic of environmental stewardship.<sup>24</sup>

The connections between childhood nature experiences and adult environmental attitudes are not unique to environmental professionals.<sup>25</sup> A recent study investigated the impacts of
