evaluating case conceptualization quality this project examines these possible inter relations The project involved a trained team of coders rating case conceptualizations found within psychotherapy reports generated at two stages of therapy The first reports coded were written following the completion of the assessment phase of therapy and the later reports were written upon client discharge from therapy In Study 1 the comparative reliabilities in coding achieved across the two methods utilized is discussed as are the strengths and weaknesses in coding and their possible causes Study 2 reports the results obtained upon examining the relationship between case conceptualization quality the therapeutic alliance and treatment outcome Results of Study 2 suggest that for more complicated or impaired client cases therapists produce higher quality conceptualizations at assessment but these generally do not predict therapy outcome or the overall alliance between therapist and client It was found that the quality of conceptualizations within discharge reports were associated with more positive therapy outcomes Case conceptualization quality at discharge was also positively associated with the therapeutic alliance
