Area Workshops Feature the CANON AE-1

Canon's newest SLR, the AE-1, follows the booming trend toward smaller, lighter SLR's. What's the secret for packaging a full complement of features into such a tiny, fully automatic camera? Basically, it's mechanical simplicity combined with ingenious electronic design.

At first glance, you might think of the AE-1 as a scaled-down Canon EF. Like the EF, the AE-1 provides fully automatic diaphragm control using the FD series of lenses. You set the electronically controlled shutter speed you want—the camera sets the f/stop. And both cameras use a single silicon photocell requiring DIC amplification. But that's where the similarity ends.

The innovative approaches in the AE-1 may point the way to future camera designs in several areas. For one thing, there's the unique memory circuit. Canon engineers, it seems, decided the memory-capacitor system for remembering the exposure data was old-hat—not sufficiently stable. Olympus felt that way too when they designed the OM-2. The Olympus OM-2 eliminates the memory capacitor by taking its reading after the mirror rises (from the opening curtain for fast speeds and from the film for slow speeds). But the Canon AE-1 takes a different approach—it uses a digital logic circuit to memorize the exposure data.

Since Canon also manufactures pocket calculators, perhaps it's not so surprising to find this type of circuitry in their AE-1. You may recall the first installment of our current series of Craftman articles on digital electronics—there, we indicated it wouldn't be long before you'd be seeing these circuits in cameras. If you're working on an AE-1, that moment has arrived.

Pushing the release button tells the bistable flip-flop to start counting. The flip-flop counts until a comparator circuit shuts it off. The comparator sees the light conditions, film speed, and shutter speed as one input. At the other input, it sees the output of the flip-flop—a binary count which has gone through a digital-to-analog converter to become a voltage level.

Most of the AE-1's components mount to the flexible circuit board. Three ICs dominate the circuit—one on each side of the pentaprism and one above the eyepiece. Canon has literally put a computer on a chip—a microprocessing system using large-scale integration (LSI) which handles just about all the camera's functions.

A single 6-volt silver-oxide battery powers all the electronic-control circuits. The battery-test button has a dual purpose—it also serves to cancel any other function by depriving the circuits of power.

Most electronically controlled cameras use one electromagnet—the AE-1 has three. You can see two of the magnets after removing the bottom plate. The electromagnet on the wind-lever side controls the closing curtain. And the combination magnet (permanent magnet plus electromagnet) on the other side releases the mirror.

When these two voltage inputs are equal, the comparator shuts off the flip-flop. The flip-flop then stores—or "remembers"—the count as long as it has operating power.

Precisely 10 ms later, the mirror releases. Here again, the AE-1 takes a novel approach—an electronic circuit releases the mirror. When you cock the shutter, a lever running across the bottom of the camera pushes an armature against a permanent magnet. The permanent magnet now holds the armature, consuming no battery power.

But there's a coil of wire wound around the permanent magnet—that makes the permanent magnet a "combination" magnet. So, 10 ms after the flip-flop starts counting, a control circuit sends a spurt of current through the coil. The coil develops a field that opposes the field of the permanent magnet. And the permanent magnet, temporarily disabled, releases the armature.

Now, the spring-loaded armature shoots toward the front of the camera and releases the mirror. As the mirror rises, it releases the opening curtain. There's nothing unusual about that part of the operation—the shutter is a conventional double-roller design. But while the mirror is
