

Chapter 8 — Memory

What are the three “processes” of memory?

Encoding, storage, and retrieval

What are iconic sensory memories and echoic sensory memories? (not covered in the textbook, only discussed in lecture/PowerPoint)

Iconic sensory memory refers to visual memory. They are very brief (less than a second). Sparkler trail question.

Echoic sensory memory refers to auditory memory. They also last for a very short time (around 3-4 seconds).

What is the difference between semantic, episodic, and procedural memory?

Semantic memory - stores general knowledge and facts, such as language and concepts.

Episodic memory - stores personal experiences and events, such as a specific day or conversation.

Procedural memory - stores information on how to perform specific tasks or skills, such as riding a bike or playing an instrument.

What are the different roles of the amygdala, hippocampus, and cerebellum in various types of memory?

The amygdala - emotional memory processing, such as fear conditioning.

The hippocampus - formation and retrieval of declarative memories, which include facts and events.

The cerebellum - procedural memory, which involves the learning and recall of motor skills, habits, and other non-conscious skills.

What is the difference between retrograde amnesia and anterograde amnesia?

Retrograde amnesia is the inability to recall memories before a traumatic event or injury.

Anterograde amnesia is the inability to form new memories after the event or injury.

Is eyewitness testimony reliable?

No, for reasons like suggestibility, the misinformation effect, and false memory syndrome.

Suggestibility refers to the effect of external influences, including leading questions or other forms of misinformation, that can lead to the creation of false memories.

The misinformation effect suggests that exposure to inaccurate information can alter a person's memory of an event, leading them to misremember details or even create entirely false memories.

False memory syndrome involves the recollection of an event that never occurred, which can be influenced by external factors or personal biases.
