

Energy Efficiency - Chapter 10 - Building Envelopes

1. What are the three main building parameters, which determine building envelope efficiency? Thermal transmittance (U-value), air permeability and thermal mass
2. What is the effect of increasing energy levels on the sustainability of high-performance building envelope and thermal transmittance (U-value) of the building envelope relative to:
 - a) the air and ground transmittance and the heat loss to the outside referring to building for a constant energy use density? (Energy transmittance (U-value) and energy use density (kWh/m²·a) are related through a factor which gives us the so-called energy transfer coefficient (U_{tr}) and the lower transmittance the more efficient the building envelope is)
 - b) the heat collected heat system after people's energy use patterns? (Increased and higher energy efficiency by lowering transmittance leads to lower energy use but also leads to lower thermal mass and energy storage capability when building is heated)
3. What are the main building parameters which affect building envelope efficiency? Four: transmittance, air permeability and heat capacity of building envelope and indoor climate
4. Describe the main principles of sustainable design for building envelope in a building that needs to provide indoor climate conditions for a sustainable building. Four: transmittance, air permeability, thermal mass and energy storage capacity
5. What are the main building parameters which affect building envelope efficiency? Four: transmittance, air permeability and heat capacity of building envelope and indoor climate
