CHARACTERS

Here are a few mini lesson ideas you can try to help teach characterization!

MINI LESSON #1	MINI LESSON #2	MINI LESSON #3	MINI LESSON #4	MINI LESSON #5
Obj: I can compare two characters in a story to myself.	Obj: I can develop a character to be used in a story.	Obj: I can identify primary and secondary characters in a story.	Obj: I can synthesize about characters in a text.	Obj: I can identify the different qualities of internal and external conflict.
Characters aren't straightforward; unless they are labeled as "what better way to practice this than by comparing yourself to the character in a text." In this lesson, have the student identify the main character or a character they wish to use. Have them draw a Venn diagram and label it before sharing, discuss with the class the different aspects of characters that can be analyzed: emotions, actions, dialogue, relationships, appearance, etc. Make a list of these aspects outside of the Venn diagram so students can use it as a checklist before ready, complete the diagram filling in similarities and differences between the two. Focusing on the different aspects on the	Understanding characters means knowing them inside and out. A great way for students to truly understand how complex characters can be is to design one themselves. Use a basic human outline found online and place it in the middle of their paper. Give them 3-5 minutes to sketch over the outline and design the appearance of their character. Discuss how the appearance can reflect a lot about the character so make sure decisions. After done drawing, have the students focus on the different aspects we discuss about characters: emotions, actions, dialogue, etc. Draw a large circle around drawing one for each aspect on the list. Allow students to transform the details of each aspect for their character, then share.	Characters in a text are frequently complex, meaning there's more to them than just one character trait. In this activity, students will be analyzing a character to identify their primary and secondary traits. Using a list of "your" traits, have students identify a character they wish to analyze. Take a piece of paper and fold it in half (Hamburger style). On one side write "Primary" and on the other "Secondary." Have the students look back over the text to identify what they believe is the primary character trait. Write it on their paper. Underneath they must find 2-3 pieces of evidence to justify their answer. On the same for the other side but this time just find 1-2 pieces of evidence. Share!	Review "synthesizing" with students and why it's important, especially when discussing and analyzing characters. Take a piece of paper and fold it into 5 sections. Number them through 5. Choose a text that you know has a complex character that changes throughout the story. Read to their class to ensure that they really grasp what the character is emphasizing. Have students go through to what they think about the character right now. Repeat this 3 times throughout the story and their notes when the class is done. On the back of the paper have students write a quick summary of their synthesis. How did the character change? Where did they begin to shift? What caused the character to change? How did your thoughts about change throughout the text?	Identify problem and solution in text is a skill that comes very easily to most students, but that's not the beginning. Students can be taught that there are multiple ways to understand conflict. One of them being the difference between internal and external conflict. Discuss the difference between problem and solution that students can use to help them with the problem. One way to help them understand that is to have them write a story that has a problem and a solution. Have the class discuss the difference between the two and use it to help them with the difference of internal and external conflict. Discuss the difference between the two and use it to help them with the difference of internal and external conflict. Discuss the difference between the two and use it to help them with the difference of internal and external conflict.
