Benefit from unobtrusive contexts: Towards the recognition of short and non-periodic activities Andreas Jahn, 2018-01-22

Context aware systems can be used in a multitude of scenarios and applications Examples include a pedestrian safety system which can help to detect a potential upcoming accident based on the knowledge of the pedestrian's activity. In the field of human activity recognition, a majority of research focuses on long lasting and continuous activities such as walking or attending a dinner. Yet the recognition of short and non periodic activities such as stepping onto the road is still poorly understood. Due to the non periodic nature, missing or incorrect recognitions of such activities imply that the entire activity is not recognized and remains unknown. This thesis focuses on short and non periodic activities, gives a definition and investigates three challenges in their recognition: inconsistent sensor data, overrepresentation of periodic activities, and evaluation of the recognition. For each challenge, a possible solution is proposed. It is shown that applying these solutions addresses the challenges and improves the recognition rates of short and non periodic activities up to 20%.
