It is necessary to distinguish three types of regional differentiation. The first one is an intersectoral one, between agriculture and industry. In Brazil one can distinguish two types of agriculture: the one above the level of family agriculture, in which the production is capitalist, commercial agriculture; the one below, family agriculture, which is still in the process of development. The second one is between the different regions of the country, which are differentiated by topography, climate, and physical energy. Brazil has three regions: the Northeast, which is the most arid, the Southeast, the one with the highest physical energy, and the South, which has a more moderate climate and more rainfall. These three regions have different types of agriculture and different levels of development. The third one is between the different types of agriculture within each region. For example, in the Northeast, there is a difference between family agriculture and capitalist agriculture.
