Between 1918 and 1929, the world lived in schizophrenia, where two worlds existed and there was mutual governmental intervention in the economy. The nations were largely protected and monopolized. However, after 1929 capitalism lost popularity and Keynesian theory gained popularity in the West. Keynes advocated for government regulation in the economy. Liberal economy government could control more the manufacturing through tariff, coal, internationalization. However, with the political changes in the 1930s came a change in economic policy. Politicians governments started away from Keynesian theory and started supported the deregulation of markets and privatization of assets. In that sense, economic policies shifted a paradigm. That savings need to drive the economy and policies of the 1930s.

Abstract: This paper examines the impact of the 1994-1995 Asian financial crisis on the political system of the Philippines. It argues that the crisis led to a significant increase in the political participation of citizens, particularly in the form of protest and civil disobedience. This increase in participation was a result of the crisis leading to a loss of confidence in the government and a desire for change. The paper also discusses the role of the media in this process and the impact of the crisis on the political system as a whole.
