

Chapter 12 Study Guide

1. What are two ways to define evolution?

One way to define evolution is "descent with modification." On a population genetics scale, evolution is a change in allele frequencies in a population over time.

2. Why can't evolution act on individuals?

Evolution is a change in allele frequencies in a population over time. Allele frequencies are a property of a population, not an individual; an individual's alleles do not change within a lifetime. The only way evolution can occur is if allele frequencies in a population change from generation to generation.

12.2

1. How does the history of evolutionary thought illustrate the process of science?

Scientists (and others) wondered about the origin of life's diversity. They proposed many possible explanations and tested them by using multiple lines of evidence (including fossils, geology, and observations of existing species). Over time, the evidence falsified some of these ideas while supporting the theory of evolution by natural selection.

2. What did Darwin observe that led him to develop his ideas about the origin of species?

As Darwin journeyed in the HMS Beagle, he observed the uniformity of geological processes such as volcanism, earthquakes, and erosion. He collected fossils and living specimens, and he observed that each location had unique species that were different from those on other continents. On the Galapagos, he observed and collected finches from different islands and noted differences in giant tortoises on different Galapagos Islands. These observations led Darwin to the idea of "descent with modification."

3. How might artificial selection and natural selection produce the same result? Which process would be faster? Why?

In artificial selection, a human chooses which individuals get to breed, in an effort to select for one or more desirable traits. In natural selection, the environment might select for the same traits, provided that those traits promote reproductive success. Artificial selection would probably be faster because the breeder can select only those individuals that come closest to the "ideal" and prevent all other individuals from reproducing in each generation. It is therefore likely to be more efficient than natural selection.

4. What is the modern evolutionary synthesis?

The modern evolutionary synthesis combines Darwin's idea of natural selection with a modern understanding of genes, chromosomes, and the origins of variation.
