Abstract: The effect of the surface roughness on the tribological behavior of the sliding contact of the polymer-coated metal surfaces was investigated. The surface roughness of the metal surfaces was controlled by the sandblasting process. The tribological behavior of the polymer-coated metal surfaces was evaluated by the ball-on-disk tribometer. The results showed that the surface roughness of the metal surfaces had a significant effect on the tribological behavior of the polymer-coated metal surfaces. The surface roughness of the metal surfaces increased the friction coefficient and the wear rate of the polymer-coated metal surfaces. The surface roughness of the metal surfaces also affected the morphology of the polymer-coated metal surfaces. The surface roughness of the metal surfaces increased the area of the polymer-coated metal surfaces. The surface roughness of the metal surfaces also affected the adhesion of the polymer-coated metal surfaces. The surface roughness of the metal surfaces increased the adhesion of the polymer-coated metal surfaces.
