Abstract: The purpose of this study was to determine if there were differences in the prevalence of risk factors associated with falls between two groups of nursing home residents. One group consisted of those who had fallen at least once during the previous year and the other group consisted of those who had not. Data were collected from 106 residents who had fallen and 97 residents who had not. A chi-square test revealed no significant difference between the two groups in terms of gender, age, race, education, marital status, or length of stay. However, there were significant differences between the two groups in terms of functional status, cognitive status, and history of falls.

2. An incident electron excites either one of the valence electrons in the atom, or an electron already in an excited state to a higher level, and a spontaneous emission transition returns the atom to the ground state. The photon that leaves the atom is a spontaneous emission transition. The energy of the transition is given by the difference in energy between the two states. The energy of the transition is given by the difference in energy between the two states.
3. The electron can also be excited to a higher level, and then it can emit a photon and return to the ground state. This is a spontaneous emission transition. The energy of the transition is given by the difference in energy between the two states.
