Building effective state institutions before introducing democracy is widely presumed to improve different development outcomes Conversely proponents of this stateness first argument anticipate that democratization before state building yields poor development outcomes In this Element we discuss several strong assumptions that different versions of this argument rests upon and critically evaluate the existing evidence base In extension we specify various observable implications We then subject the stateness first argument to multiple tests focusing on economic growth as an outcome First we conduct historical case studies of two countries with different institutional sequencing histories Denmark and Greece and assess the stateness first argument e g by using a synthetic control approach Thereafter we draw on an extensive global sample of about 180 countries measured across 1789 2019 and leverage panel regressions preparametric matching and sequence analysis to test a number of observable implications Overall we find little evidence to support the stateness first argument Economic Development and Democratization Sangmin Lee,1994 The Democratization of Art Ruthven Holmes Byrum,1920

Emerging Concepts Divergent Paths of Democratization Bum Suk Kim, 2001 This dissertation examines the patterns and causes of national differences of democratic development processes in Taiwan and South Korea I focus on three main tasks First I identify how the modes of transitions were different Second I examine why these different transition paths occurred by focus on the prior regime type political society and civil society Third I analyze the prospects for democratic consolidation First I argue that Taiwan's transition was a top down regime controlled slow elite dominated and unilaterally imposed transition Taiwan's transition was implemented from relatively strong and secure authoritarian regime rather than forced upon the regime by broad social mobilization On the contrary South Korean case was a bottom up mass ascendent fast and multilaterally compromised transition Extensive popular mobilization from below forced the regime elite to make a compromise with the opposition Second I argue that Taiwan's transition was caused by the quasi Leninist party state with no prior democratic experience and the weak political and civil society while South Korea's transition was caused by the military authoritarianism with prior democratic experiences and strong political and civil society In Taiwan there was no opposition party and elections were limited to local levels Moreover civil society was deeply penetrated by the KMT and the labor class was further weakened by decentralized industrial structures On the contrary in South Korea opposition parties were legally allowed to function and the elections were regularly held under authoritarian regime With prior democratic experience civil society was strong and the labor class was strengthened by the high degree of industrial concentration Finally following the path dependent approach I argue that the prospect for democratic consolidation is more complicated in Taiwan than in South Korea Democratizing Development Clemens Stubbe Østergaard, Frands Dolberg, Aarhus Universitet.
